Reforms are a continuing phenomenon: C Rangarajan

Prime Minister P V Narasimha Rao had second thoughts after the July 1 devaluation and wanted to stop the second devaluation. Apparently Finance Minister Manmohan Singh tried to reach you but couldn't. Do you think history would have taken a different course if you had not gone ahead with the second devaluation?

■ The decision on devaluation is usually announced by the government. In 1991, it was done differently. The RBI was daily announcing the value of the rupee those days (I was in charge of it). At the meeting on devaluation, it was decided that this time the RBI would announce the decision as part of its daily announcement. Since the level of devaluation was huge, it was also decided to do it in two stages. Much of the help that we were expecting from outside would have taken a beating if we had not gone through with the second stage of devaluation. It was a measure of our determination to do the right thing. Failure to go through with the second stage would have sent the wrong message.

At that time, did you also brief PM Rao or was your communication channel always through Manmohan Singh?

■ Before becoming governor, I was a member of the Planning Commission, of which Narasimha Rao, as the Prime minister, was the chairman. The eighth plan report had to be approved by the PM. It detailed many things we had to do to overcome the crisis and move forward. I had talked to him on these matters at that time. After becoming governor, most of my discussions were with Manmohan Singh. But I did meet PM Rao either directly or along with the finance minister.

How did you view the economic reforms from

C Rangarajan, then deputy governor of the Reserve Bank of India, oversaw a two-step devaluation of the rupee on July 1 and 3, 1991

Mint Street?

■ The reforms made a break with the past. They did away with the multitude of permits and licences that dominated the Indian economy. The role of the state was modified and finally the new strategy of development did away with the old import-substitution policy. By embracing international trade, India was accepting the challenge and opportunity of integrating into the world economy. This approach is very different from what we used to do when faced with BoP problems earlier. Narasimha Rao never used the word “break”; he always talked of “continuity” and the “middle path”. He did so because he had to carry not only the Opposition but also his own party. Manmohan Singh was right when he quoted and said liberalisation was an “idea whose time had come”.

You ended automatic monetisation of the Budget deficit in 1994. How did it start and why do you think it took so long to abolish it?

■ Automatic monetisation was the result of a seemingly innocuous agreement between the RBI and government under which when government balances fell below a particular level, it would be replenished by the issue of ad hoc treasury bills. I talked about it in a memorial lecture, and thereafter I had discussed the matter with Manmohan Singh. He immediately recognised the need to correct this. But we also recognised that the central government would also need some Ways and Means advances to tide over temporary mismatches between revenues and expenditures. This had to be worked out. This was part of our efforts to minimise monetisation of the Budget deficit.

Did the idea of banking reforms, including allowing private banks, come from Mahmohan Singh or the RBI?

■ One of the major elements in the reform process was to put an end to restrictions on entry and growth of firms. We wanted a more competitive environment in all areas. Extending this principle to the banking industry, we felt that more banks were needed and particularly in the private sector. There was no enactment barring the setting up of private banks. The provision in the Banking Act to allow for banks to set up in the private sector was not acted upon. So, I decided to allow new private banks to set up. This was discussed with the finance minister and the ministry. We had to also outline the criteria for setting up banks by the private sector. It must be understood that at that time there was a high degree of consultation and communication between the RBI and finance ministry. We worked together to usher in a new regime and that needed continued consultation among all.

Was there political opposition to stake sale in public sector banks (PSBs)?

■ Reducing the share of government holding in PSBs required talking with political parties. It is not just Opposition leaders alone. Even leaders of the Congress had to be convinced. The point that we made was that since the government would hold 51 per cent of the share capital, these banks would remain PSBs. It has also to be noted that reducing the stake took a long time. We had to convince private participants that investing in PSBs was worthwhile. This could happen only after we had strengthened the PSBs.

Was there any proposal or decision that you and Manmohan Singh deferred on?

■ As I mentioned earlier, we were going through a period in which we had to overcome the crisis and bring about fundamental changes in the development strategy. In this context, all the participants — the government and RBI — met often and thrashed out various concerns on major issues like putting an end to monetisation of fiscal deficit, moving towards a new exchange rate regime, bringing about changes in the banking system such as strengthening capital and introducing prudential measures. On these various measures there was no conflict. There could have been some differences on modalities, but we worked as a team as the criticality of times demanded it.

What is the unfinished agenda in banking reforms?

■ Reforms are a continuing phenomenon. As circumstances change, we need to introduce new measures to take care of new challenges. There are still issues to be addressed such as small banks versus large banks, universal banking, continuous authorisation, consolidation, role of foreign banks, operations of Indian banks overseas and government ownership. These need to be addressed on an ongoing basis.

Lavasa terms SIR legal but unfair, urges civil servants to have empathy

ARCHIS MOHAN
New Delhi, 3 September

Terming the Election Commission's (EC's) Special Intensive Revision (SIR), which has until now struck the names of 130 million electors off electoral rolls, as unfair, former Election Commissioner of India Ashok Lavasa said on Thursday that personalisation of the government and the state within a political party, threats to the country's federal character, and the belief among statutory bodies and the government that might is right, are challenges facing Indian democracy.

Delivering the first Jagdeep Chhokar Memorial Lecture on “leadership, ethics and public service”, Lavasa termed it disturbing that statutory institutions, and constitutional bodies of India's body politic, including the government, have started behaving as if might is right. He said the concept of “might is right” belongs to medieval times “where somebody who had might would say that whatever I do is right”.

Pointing to the EC's SIR, Lavasa said, “Now the institutions which have the might of law invested in them, think that whatever they do is right.” He said SIR is an unfair procedure imposed on millions of people in the country, and the judiciary has validated it since it's been argued that it is legal. “Of course, it is legal. (But) Is it fair,” Lavasa asked, adding that justice is not merely about enforcing the letter, but is also about protecting its spirit.

The former Indian Administrative Service (IAS) officer said 130 million electors have been deleted from electoral rolls, and the reply is that they

“ARE WE TRYING TO CREATE A SITUATION IN WHICH PEOPLE ARE DISENCHANTED WITH THE PROCESS OF DEMOCRACY?... NOW WE ARE CREATING AN ENVIRONMENT IN WHICH PEOPLE FIND IT SO DIFFICULT”

Ashok Lavasa, ex-election commissioner and that is what I think we need to understand,” he said. He faulted all political parties for refusing to come under the purview of the Right to Information (RTI) Act, and for agreeing to the electoral bond scheme, which the Supreme Court eventually struck down in 2024. He bemoaned that political parties have stopped raising issues that are of public interest.

Lavasa underlined the need for ethics and empathy in public life, and urged civil servants and people's representatives to have the ability to hear the voice of the poor and the marginalised, invoking John Stuart Mill's warning that a people can be induced to “lay their liberties at the feet of a great man, or trust him with powers which enable him to subvert their institutions”.

Lavasa also spoke about his association with Chhokar, including their shared love for Urdu poetry. Chhokar passed away on September 12, 2025, in New Delhi at the age of 80. He was a co-founder of poll rights body Association for Democratic Reforms (ADR), and also a respected academic, civic activist, lawyer, engineer and conservationist. On his death, the ADR said that Chhokar's vision reshaped the way India thinks about elections and accountability. A memorial book containing his articles released on the occasion stated that Chhokar's life was distinguished by his commitment to strengthening democratic governance promoting transparency in Indian public life.

Born on November 25, 1944, Chhokar earned degrees in engineering in 1967, pursued a Master of Business Administration (MBA) from Delhi University's Faculty of Management Studies (1977) and later earned a doctorate from the Louisiana State University in the US. He joined IIM-Ahmedabad in 1985, teaching in the field of organisational behaviour, including at IIM-Ahmedabad, until his retirement in 2006. He co-founded the ADR in 1999. For over two decades, Chhokar and his colleagues at the ADR spearheaded several landmark judicial interventions. These included the 2002 Supreme Court judgment making it mandatory for candidates to disclose their criminal cases, assets, and educational qualifications, and its most recent has been to challenge the EC's SIR. The ADR's other recent notable intervention was challenging the electoral bonds scheme, which the Supreme Court struck down in 2024.

In 1999, Chhokar and his IIM colleague Tarlochan Sastry petitioned the Delhi High Court, where they said candidates in elections to the Lok Sabha and state assemblies disclose criminal cases pending against them in their nomination papers. In its verdict next year, the court said it should be mandatory for candidates to disclose criminal cases pending against them, which the Supreme Court upheld in 2002.
